Explanations

SAMPLE

1. Where is John's final residence during this chapter?

- A. London lighthouse
- B. A desert cave
- C. A hillside hermitage
- D. A private estate in the countryside

John's final residence in this chapter is the London lighthouse. This setting shows his deliberate withdrawal from the World State and from the life he can't bear any longer—the noise, crowds, and shallow comforts of society. The lighthouse sits apart from the crowded city, a stark, modern structure that acts as a sanctuary where he can impose his own rules, read freely, and wrestle with his ideals away from outside influence. It's not a rustic or cozy refuge; it's a beacon-like symbol of his attempt to seek truth and discipline in isolation, which is why it fits this moment best. The other options don't align with what he chooses: a desert cave or hillside hermitage would place him in distant, pastoral settings, and a private countryside estate would contradict his move toward a solitary, morally charged withdrawal from the World State.

2. Whom does John the Savage keep quoting and why?

- A. Shakespeare to express his adoration
- B. Marx to criticize society
- C. Homer to recall home
- D. Dante to describe power

John's Shakespeare quotes show his deep admiration for beauty, emotion, and human complexity—things the World State denies or trivializes. Shakespeare's language lets him voice feelings of love, longing, and moral struggle that he can't safely express through the society's empty slogans. By turning to the bard, he highlights what he values about art and humanity and uses those lines to contrast the hollow, controlled world around him. The other options don't fit because they point to themes (nostalgia for home, political critique, or power) that Shakespeare's scenes of love, tragedy, and inner conflict better capture in explaining John's not-so-hidden adoration for genuine life.

3. What understanding do John and Mond reach by the end of the chapter?

- A. John's wishes would lead to unhappiness (God, poverty, danger, freedom, goodness and sin)
- B. They decide to ban all emotion
- C. They decide to exile John
- D. They decide to merge their societies

The main idea is the clash between authentic human longing and a society that engineers happiness by suppressing deep beliefs and moral conflict. John wants religion and the full range of human experience—God, danger, freedom, goodness, sin—elements that give life meaning but also bring pain. Mond explains that permitting those longings would destabilize the World State and make people unhappy because the system is built to keep them satisfied through conditioned pleasure and the absence of genuine moral struggle. By the end, they understand that if John's deepest wishes were allowed, they would lead to unhappiness for individuals and for society as a whole. That's why the choice reflecting this understanding is correct. The other options don't fit because the discussion isn't about banning all emotion, exile, or merging the societies; it centers on recognizing that these deep yearnings cannot coexist with the World State's order.

4. Why is it considered a bad idea to allow people to develop games for which no equipment is needed?

- A. It increases consumption.
- B. It doesn't increase consumption.
- C. It requires expensive equipment.
- D. It leads to more violent behavior.

The main idea being tested is how making development easy by removing equipment barriers affects consumption. If anyone can create games without any gear, it lowers the entry barrier and expands who can contribute, but it doesn't inherently push people to buy more goods or use more resources. In this scenario, development can happen with existing devices and digital distribution, so overall physical consumption doesn't rise. The other options imply outcomes that don't follow from "no equipment is needed": it doesn't require expensive gear, it isn't automatically tied to more violent behavior, and the key point is that consumption wouldn't increase.

5. What does the crowd's irritation with the Savage illustrate about the society?

- A. Society welcomes dissent
- B. Society suppresses dissent and demands conformity
- C. Society is indifferent
- D. Society encourages debate

The situation highlights how the society keeps order through conformity and punishment of dissent. In Brave New World, people are conditioned from birth to be comfortable with sameness and to avoid questioning or deep emotion. When the Savage presents ideas, beliefs, or behaviors that challenge that scripted order, the crowd's irritation isn't about personal dislike so much as a protective reaction against anything that unsettles the social script. Their hostility shows that deviation from the approved norms is not tolerated; dissent is marginalized and policed through public ridicule and pressure. This is why the correct view isn't that the society welcomes dissent, is indifferent, or encourages debate—it demonstrates the opposite: a system that suppresses dissent in favor of unwavering conformity.

6. John's understanding with Mond centers on which concept?

- A. That true happiness may require elements society normally suppresses
- B. That happiness is easily achieved by conditioning
- C. That happiness is unnecessary
- D. That technology should control all life

The main idea being tested is whether genuine happiness might require things society tends to suppress. In Brave New World, Mond argues that the World State keeps people content through conditioning and by suppressing powerful human experiences—religion, art, family, and deep personal meaning. John's perspective, formed by exposure to these suppressed elements and to suffering and truth found in poetry and tragedy, suggests that true happiness would require those very experiences that society blocks. So the best choice captures this tension: true happiness may depend on elements society normally suppresses. The other options miss this core tension: happiness isn't simply achieved by conditioning, it isn't regarded as unnecessary, and it isn't about technology controlling everything in this context.

7. Who invades the hospital and why their actions drive him crazy?

- A. Delta children because they view death as pleasant and useful rather than feared
- B. Alpha nurses
- C. Beta doctors
- D. Gamma patients

Conditioning and caste-based worldview shape how people respond to death in Brave New World. Delta children are trained to be practical and to see death as a natural, useful part of life rather than something to fear. When they invade the hospital, their actions reflect this belief, showing how deeply the state has engrained a utilitarian attitude toward mortality. This normalized, emotionless stance clashes with the protagonist's more human sense of mortality and feeling, and witnessing such regimented acceptance can drive him to madness. It highlights how social engineering has replaced genuine emotion with routine, making even the personal act of dying feel like just another function of a well-ordered society.

8. What does everyone have with their after-dinner coffee?

- A. Somas
- B. Tea
- C. Alcohol
- D. Water

The idea being tested is how a universal drug serves as a tool of social control in Brave New World. Soma is the substance that everyone takes to stay calm, cheerful, and compliant, turning even after-dinner moments into a ritual of effortless happiness. This widespread use means discomfort, dissatisfaction, or rebellion are quickly erased, ensuring social harmony without real engagement or critical thought. That's why the correct choice fits best: Soma is the drug designed to maintain contentment and obedience. The other options don't play the same role in the story—tea is just a beverage, alcohol could provoke trouble rather than suppress it, and water is neutral and lacks the coercive social function Soma provides.

9. What does hypnopaedia teach the children?

- A. Sleep-teaching that includes broadcasts from London; speeches by George Bernard Shaw
- B. Nightly sermons by D.H.C.
- C. Dream therapy
- D. Language lessons only

Hypnopaedia is the sleep-teaching method used to condition children with the World State's beliefs. It works by having repetitive moral and social messages play while the children sleep, embedding the norms and expectations of society deep in their minds. In the book, the content often comes from broadcasts from London, featuring voices like George Bernard Shaw to lend authority and cultural resonance to the lessons. This combination—sleep-based learning plus authoritative broadcasts—explains why the correct choice emphasizes sleep-teaching with London broadcasts and Shaw's speeches. The other options describe different ideas (in-person sermons, dream therapy, or language-only lessons) that don't capture how hypnopaedia is depicted as indoctrination embedded in nighttime learning.

10. How does Bernard discredit the DHC and avoid punishment?

A. He brings Linda, who is older and unattractive, to reveal John's origins

B. He accuses DHC of bias

C. He bribes the DHC

D. He escapes to Iceland

In this world, power rests on maintaining a flawless public image and using secrecy to suppress personal realities. Bernard undermines the DHC by exposing a hidden personal truth: the DHC once had a relationship with Linda and fathered John. By bringing Linda back to London—she is old and unattractive by the world's standards—and revealing John's origins, Bernard shatters the DHC's image of impeccable control over reproduction and his moral authority. The public revelation shows the DHC as fallible and hypocritical, which erodes his position and forces a resignation, while Bernard avoids punishment because the scandal shifts the accountability onto the DHC rather than onto him. The other options don't fit the plot: bribery isn't involved, simply accusing bias doesn't cause the same public collapse, and Bernard does not escape to Iceland as his primary tactic.
