1. In Severn City, which institution serves as the cultural archive?

- A. The Library of Severn
- B. The Museum of Civilization
- C. The Archive of Humanity
- D. The Museum of Science

This item is about recognizing which Severn City institution functions as a cultural archive—a place that preserves artifacts, memory, and stories from civilization's past for future generations. The Museum of Civilization is described as that cultural repository in Severn City. It acts as the keeper of cultural memory, collecting relics, artworks, and records that represent human history and culture, so people can reflect on where they came from. The other institutions serve different roles: The Library of Severn focuses on providing access to texts and information; The Museum of Science highlights scientific exhibits; The Archive of Humanity is not depicted as Severn City's cultural archive.

2. What recurring symbol links the past and present in Station Eleven?

- A. The Station Eleven graphic novel
- B. Shakespeare's plays
- C. The traveling symphony
- D. The Museum's artifacts

A graphic novel within the story acts as the thread that ties past and present together. In Station Eleven, this book exists before the collapse and keeps surfacing in the lives of survivors afterward, serving as a tangible reminder of a world that came before and a source of meaning for those rebuilding. Characters reference it, pass it along, and it becomes a shared artifact that many care about, making it the clearest through-line that links different timelines and memories. The traveling symphony and Shakespeare's plays are crucial to the world's culture and memory, but they function more as ongoing art forms within the narrative rather than a single object that repeatedly anchors past and present. Museum artifacts are important remnants of history, yet they don't serve as the recurring, interactive symbol that characters repeatedly return to across eras.

3. Which authorial work serves as memory anchor for Kirsten?

- A. The Station Eleven graphic novels
- B. The Odyssey
- C. The Great Gatsby
- D. The Brothers Karamazov

Memory anchors in Station Eleven are the books and stories that survivors cling to, using them to remember who they are and decide what to do in a world that has lost its old assurances. For Kirsten, The Brothers Karamazov provides that grounding because it deeply probes questions of faith, guilt, and moral responsibility—issues that survive even when institutions fall away. Facing danger, ambiguity, and loss, she can recall Dostoevsky's exploration of how a person ought to act when there's no clear authority, and this helps her determine what's right in the moment. The themes of suffering, compassion, and ethical choice give her a framework to interpret events and to hold onto humanity amid chaos, making this work the most fitting memory touchstone for her. The other options, though meaningful in different ways, don't map as directly to the moral questions Kirsten confronts, so The Brothers Karamazov stands out as the strongest anchor.

4. Which of the following is NOT identified as essential to surviving disaster in the book?

- A. Scientific progress alone
- B. Art and memory
- C. Community and storytelling
- D. Human connection

Survival after disaster in the book hinges on art, memory, community, and human connection rather than science alone. The story shows that keeping culture alive through art and storytelling helps people hold onto their identities and hope, even when technology and institutions have collapsed. The traveling symphony and other acts become lifelines—ways to remember what was lost and to find meaning in the present. Community and storytelling knit people together, creating networks of mutual aid and shared rituals that sustain resilience during hardship. Human connection—trusted friends, neighbors, and found families—provides support, empathy, and purpose that pure technical skill can't supply. Because of that, the idea that scientific progress alone is essential isn't presented as a sufficient path to surviving the disaster; it's one piece, not the whole picture.

5. What is Miranda's art project?

- A. The Dr. Eleven graphic novels.
- B. A photography series titled The End of the World.
- C. A sculpture collection about surveillance.
- D. A novel about space exploration.

This question tests recognition of what Miranda creates as her art project. Miranda Carroll is a graphic novelist, and her notable body of work in the story is a graphic novel series titled Dr. Eleven. That project is central to her character and to how her art survives alongside the collapse, making it the defining artistic work associated with her. So the best choice is the Dr. Eleven graphic novels because they are explicitly linked to Miranda as her creative project. The other options describe different types of works that aren't attributed to Miranda in the story, such as a photography series, a sculpture collection, or a space-focused novel.

6. The survivors travel with which group that provides cultural continuity?

- A. The Army
- B. The Archivists
- C. The Symphony
- D. The Scouts

Art serving as a living link to the past is how survivors keep a sense of who they are after civilization's collapse. The traveling Symphony does this by moving from place to place with music, poetry, and performances of Shakespeare, turning art into a shared experience they carry into communities. This active transmission of culture gives people something to hold onto—memory, beauty, and a sense of continuity—when daily life is about survival. The group embodies cultural continuity by making culture portable and accessible, not just preserving it in a static archive. The other groups play different roles. The Army represents order and protection through force, not the ongoing carrying of cultural life. The Archivists preserve knowledge and artifacts, which is important, but they aren't the traveling troupe that directly sustains culture through performance. The Scouts focus on survival and other priorities rather than performing and sharing art. So the Symphony is the one that most directly provides cultural continuity through its traveling performances.

7. The traveling group after the outbreak consists of which types of performers?

- A. Dancers and jugglers.
- B. Musicians and Shakespeare actors.
- C. Singers only.
- D. Actors only.

The idea being tested is who makes up the traveling group after the outbreak. In Station Eleven, the Traveling Symphony is formed by musicians and Shakespearean actors who travel from settlement to settlement, performing music and Shakespeare plays to keep culture alive in the post-collapse world. That blend—musicians plus Shakespeare actors—is what defines the troupe, making this option the best fit. Dancers and jugglers, singers only, or actors only don't capture the actual composition of the group.

8. Who is the author of the graphic novel Station Eleven within the story?

- A. The Conductor
- B. Clark
- C. Miranda Carroll
- D. Arthur Leander

The author within the story is Miranda Carroll. In the world of Station Eleven, Miranda is a graphic novelist who creates the graphic novel Station Eleven, and she is identified in the narrative as its creator. The other characters—The Conductor, Clark, and Arthur Leander—play different roles (a leader of the traveling group, an archivist/curator, and the actor whose death sparks much of the plot), but none of them are described as the author of the graphic novel. So Miranda Carroll is the correct answer because she is established in the story as the writer and artist of that work, making her the within-story author.

9. Which statement is true about Dieter in the described events?

- A. Dieter survives unharmed
- B. Dieter has died
- C. Dieter is the Prophet
- D. Dieter is present at the reunion

The statement hinges on Dieter's fate across the events. In the described sequence, Dieter dies, so he cannot be present later or at a reunion. That's why this option matches the events best. The other possibilities don't fit because the Prophet is a different character, not Dieter, and someone who has died wouldn't be described as surviving unharmed or as being present at a reunion.

10. Which theme does art help revisit in the pre-collapse era?

- A. The isolation of individuals
- B. The power and fragility of civilization
- C. The randomness of fate
- D. The superiority of technology

Art in the pre-collapse era foregrounds how civilization is built on shared culture, stories, and rituals that give people a sense of meaning and community. The traveling performances, literature, and music shown in that time illustrate that civilization isn't just about technology or institutions—it's about the collective life that art sustains. At the same time, this era also makes clear that such culture is fragile: it depends on social order, memory, and cooperation, all of which can unravel under stress. So the theme art helps revisit is the power and fragility of civilization. The other ideas don't fit as neatly because art here is not primarily about individual isolation, randomness of fate, or technology's supremacy; it's about how culture and shared meaning both uphold and jeopardize a civilization, especially when systems are under threat.
